The image is a large, dense block of base64-encoded data. The first few bytes of the encoded data are 'data:image/png;base64,', which indicates that the data represents a PNG image. The rest of the image is a long string of alphanumeric characters, which is the base64 representation of the image's raw data. The string is very long and contains many special characters, including spaces, tabs, and line breaks, which are used for formatting and readability. The overall appearance is that of a large, complex data structure, likely a high-resolution image or a large file.

Using the Nofollow attribute prevents value from being passed to the linking page, but it's worth noting that these links are still taken into account when calculating the value that is passed through each link, so Nofollow links can also dilute pagerank.
